

A Geography of Belonging

Are we belonging to society or nature? Or maybe the right question is to be formulated differently? Well, yes, a different formulation will bring up a completely different perspective on the subject. For example, what we will inevitably ask ourselves is whether we are to submit to a societal or a natural duty. Of course we grow up in the positivism of a social milieu which turns us to believe that society will in the end find a solutions to all problems and that socially we will handle our human destiny.

Critically thinking, the quantification of power, capitalism, is at last the drive that conducts the enterprises of the social members to a constant self-destruction. Are we to contribute to it? Are we to devote ourselves to this contracting utopia of a society mending her own inflictions. Any automated exploitation is at the source of evil. This exploitation now has reached the very soul of people, the very last bit of nature that was left virgin. A drive to new technological progress ought to be constantly healed through compensating technologies. The circle becomes vicious.

How do we stop the vicious progression in which we are completely sacrificing every bit of our nature? The answer is irresolutely nature. We ought to engage with now and effortfully. Recultivating our nature is the only hinder to the vicious circle in which the mechanization and later our softwarization can be black circuit. As we become elements of the mechanical beast society has now even provided with a brain, has this brain start thinking of its own and projecting on us its monstrosity, it is time now to reborn into natural beings before we ourselves turn into either innocent grass to feed the machine or small beasts.

As humanity is thus polarizing, humans should make a great effort to demonstrate their natural autonomy. Check in the nature within and progressively recover a natural domain to express a last glimpse of humanity. Only from there you might be able to project back the power and more over the spirituality of a human nature on the verge to dissolve in the blood of its own Frankenstein creation, an enforced social construction killing of all human talents. And now this talent should be used as an Ulysses against it the return to our fatherland shall be placed as our main priority.
