

Renaturalizing Social Work

It is clear that too much social work destories the natural work. It is clear that social work is like a heavy head attempting to set free from its body and invetibaly precipitate. Social work and society at large ought to pay much respect to nature and the work that the other portion of humanity is undertaking there.

It is only in nature that society is able to calibrate its instinct to go astray. When the social abstraction looses its reins it is the natural work that is at last persecuted and ultimately decimated, removing the only solid base to human artificiality. Single individuals remain to accept the imminent social collapse and package the essence for a natural resurrection.