

The Real Heat of Nature

Every nation, just like a person, every nation has its mood. We live in a period of life characterized by a great sacrifice of what is most holly, our intellect. The electronic media in particular are the black stars of all social members.

As each and every intellect disappear, compying to the simplified and marketing driven interfaces of the black stars of our bright sky, what is the human destiny ahead? Like mosquitoes we are attracted to the bright artificial light.

Ironically it is the lightless north to become the official hub for all the contemporary excitement. Humanly we cannot but expose our self to such a light like an Ulysses who must anchor himslef to whatever vehicle bringing him back to mother nature.

The giant effort of this time is in fact this, exposing oneself to inverted cave of artificial media while bricolaging and excamuflae necessary to drift from it and recover a lost nature. It is in this respect that the willing and perseverance towards this goal ought to be developed within.
