

Re-empowering Divine

It is clear that all civilizations are doomed to develop corruption; they grow in their worldly ambition giving less and less space to the pursuit of the spiritual. All projected to the progress of their civilization, humans lose the means to look within themselves. It is therefore imperative for those few rediscovering their nature to not only exercise their navigation within its vast spaces but also to project this inertness outward.

The blinding simulation of the sun to which we have got ourselves accustomed to look straight through, has caused our arrogance towards any form of divine. Originally forms of divine cannot simply exalt the natural light of god but ought to perform rituals which re-empower it. They ought to amplify the natural light just enough to compete with the artificial medium of electricity. This competition cannot but occur through a process of abduction.

To subdue the soul erasing medium we have come to generate, the few humans able to recognize their nature and understand the need to project it, ought to compete with the machine. I mean that the avoidance of the machine or the direct destruction of it are not possible ways. To compete with the machine humans are doomed to become like machines, becoming in command of its processes via a constant re-enactment of its processes.

The ritualism of this can be found with the advent of older forms of technologies in the future and yet, in our electronic age, the ritualism to perform like the machine to regain our soul has yet to be recognized. This lack of recognition will eventually bring the world to high level of crisis and much misery is ahead in order to reconsider a contemplation of our being under the sphere of this new fire.