The Fluid Soul

Any kind of political movement builds a cage. We can't say that one or the other is better for the people. The left build a cage around the individual while the right builds it around the nation. These are equally suffocating in the long run and the only way to breath is to try using democracy as way to switch from one cage to the other in order to experience a temporal liberation.

I have named the left and the right building respectively a cage around the single individuals and around the people as a whole. There is obviously a third kind of movement which I will call the center as it is also the most philanthropic looking and in this respect it only masks a most aristocratic heart. While this center movement seems to be the best as it keeps its people breathing and free it construct its cages elsewhere.

The western countries of the north, liberated by its socialist cages are thus becoming the ideal political models but in fact have their cages set in the poor foreign countries where "they bring work". In this global context would there have be a political solution.

In my opinion yes and no. I mean yes, if we stop thinking of the polis, or the cities but focus on the governance of communities from the community. No because as soon as we create the entity of these community immediately other communities will feel tempted to absorb them and we will need a overlaying governance in order to protect this community from such a threat.

Where do we go from here? From where do we depart accepting this understanding? Life springs within us and we ought to at this point, beyond all forms of politics, become ourselves liquid and infiltrate and move though the inevitable cracks of the system attempting never to stagnate.

This ought to be our main objective in life, the maintenance of its fluidity constantly under-threat from systems of capturing and filtering. We ought to engineer our own system of fluidity, wet the ground wherever it is possible and bring new life until we can and ought to move forward.
