

Our Mortal Loop

Hypothetically we could define two great forces characterizing the coming into being of an empire. One force is inclined to fully embrace it and the other force to utterly reject it. Ideologies are born in support of the latter strand. I mean this is my view of history as my view of Roman Stoicism in relation to the coming to being of the Roman Empire, German Marxism in relation to the coming to being of the German Empire and so forth.

Rather than talking about technological paradigms I am thus more inclined to talk about Empires as I see that in fact whatever is the new technological development, it brings along a new power configuration that only ideologies can hinder. Now history has shown us over and over how at last an ideology is embraced by the very Empire it so starkly opposed. I here think of Christianity, I think of Communism and one can think of any such ideology that to begin with rises as an opposition to a new form of imperialistic enslavement of human life but later it is embedded in the actual empire.

I can go as far as to dare claiming that no Empire is ever stable and/or mature unless it phagocytes the very ideologies that has emerged along with its coming into being and that has so fiercely opposed its establishment. My reasoning may seem rather sketchy especially in the eyes of those knowledge gatekeepers who, alas are filled with notions but do not seem to have immersed themselves into human nature and its historical recurrences. I believe that only such immersion can help an individual to come to a certain conclusion dictated not by the mind but by the heart.

We are experiencing a particular moment of time of great transformation. One cannot claim that there is any longer some kind of a cause and effect. We cannot claim that because of climate change there is economic change that bring political change that bring in turn social change etcetera. Change is just occurring in all fronts, everything can tell us that there is a transformation in action, a great one investing the whole of our reality as we know it.

Now we cannot waste our time claiming that it is because of for example politicians that a certain change is occurring, or claiming that it is because environmental issues that this great transformation is in action. Let's meditate this for a moment not much out of the datasets we have acquired or we are contributing in acquiring. I have a feeling that transformation is something beyond us humans and our poor understanding, an understanding just turned arrogant by our little and very much relative sciences.

Something tells me that the transformation we are experiencing is occurring beyond all the possible arguments we are bringing in whatever table of discussion. There is perhaps something more divine to it that we can imagine and with divine I mean not that it comes as some sort of direct punishment to our actions. I do believe in earthly cycles, I do believe in great seasons yet I also do believe that humans with their actions can accelerate such transformations.

Our mortal existence is but a nested loop within a greater loops of mortality. What we can conceive as the immortal or god is but at the very edge of this mortality, it is the mortal loop embracing all other nested loops. In this respect I believe that the right attitude for us is that of acceptance of our mortality; it is meant to be. In this acceptance perhaps we will in fact be able to leave the right dimension for another mortality loop to take place. In all our apprehension the risk is that as a small cancer cell indeed we will manage to alter the entire program.

We as individual variables within the minor nested loop we are running, ought to understand that perhaps all that matters is in fact that we run the script we have been programmed to run. This script is by far not the script society tells us to run but a script that lays within each and everyone of us. This script somewhat specifies our natural/divine duty. We ought to perform such a script without the additional noise characterizing our contemporary era, an era that in fact risks to alter the entire program we are part of.

To some degree then all it is left for us is to acknowledge change without panic. The death of our loop will come and so the death of the loops nesting our loop but we ought to relay on the fact that new loops will develop and new variables will replace us. It is in this respect most unnatural to turn our variable being into a constant, the very constant then that I attribute to the attempt of turning Imperialistic of subtracting our loop from the main universal loop and in this degree forever dying without any possible regeneration.

In this respect I warn against any attempt to immortality whether we project it on the nation we live or on old selves. I invite everyone to naturally live out their lives as the attempt to live longer is always at the expenses of other humans as well as of human nature. In this respect I invite to accept our human condition and no longer cheat the natural system of things attaching us to insurances and machineries to grant us a longer life.

Death is but the reaching of a harbour and yet so much indignation we experience today for the deadly collapse of an infrastructure, a deadly hurricane. So much we blame others for it and so much we remove life from our humanity by attempting to secure life within a fully sealed and deathproof sterile environment not knowing that by doing so life will simply die.
