

PALACE 11/12 By fleeing Scandinavia to attempt to construct my palace back in Italy I was sure to be at home and less under attack by secular and dry academics despising any form of spirituality yet themselves representing the new priesthood with their canons, dogmas and imposed ethics. The result was however quite different than expected and even in my homeland folk started despising my idea. At this point I considered moving with my family in one of the many empty churches for sale in the Netherlands and to decorate these churches with adapting my works to them. This was however not possible given that these churches are considered monuments and have to be kept as such. My bitter experience with the Italian fascist representatives trying to sabotage my plan later turned me against any form of conformism both academic and religious. I started seeking for a more Stoic kind of spirituality adhering to the building of the cube as a geometric perfection that can cut through adversities (Fig. Screenshot of one of the many abandoned churches for sale in the Netherlands. The very one I was looking at with my girlfriend was located in the very dynamic and culturally vivid city of Arnhem where perhaps my life project would have received a better reception than the violent attempt of sabotage I received in Italy after fully agreeing with the authorities on how to go about).
